

~HERITAGE CORNER

Museum prepares for another great season

Volunteers at the Moore Museum have been busy this winter. One important project they've been working on is the creation of a new reserve collection (storage) for the textile and framed works collections. Reserve collection storage areas are vital to a museum because they protect artifacts from light and handling, as well as provide for variety in the items on display.

Volunteers are currently constructing and painting storage racks for rolled storage of the quilt collection.

When the museum opens its doors for another great season this spring, much of the work its dedicated volunteers have done this winter will not be immediately evident. However, you can be sure your visit will have been made better and more enriching because of the hard work and long hours the volunteers have put into keeping the facility safe, well-maintained, and visitor-ready.

Moore Museum volunteer Dave Beers works to replace floor joists inside the one-room school house.